In the decades before the Thirty Year's War, religious wars raged across Europe. Catholics and Protestants battled for control of the continent's religious future. During this time, ~~the~~ there were rulers, called politiqués, who put religion, even their own, below their political ambitions. Two great politiqués were Elizabeth ~~the~~ I of England and Catherine de ~~the~~ Médicis of France. Elizabeth worked and lived for her country as a whole, trying to unify her subjects under common religious beliefs. Catherine de Médicis of France worked without regard for religion in her efforts to preserve her family's control of the French throne. Although both of these rulers ~~tried to~~ worked around religion, there were great differences to how each of them handled their situation.

Elizabeth I was a great ruler and a politiqué in the truest sense of the word. When she came to power, England had experienced many ~~problems~~ religious problems. England had broken with ~~the~~ Catholicism and became Protestant during the reign of Elizabeth's father, Henry VIII. When Elizabeth's half-sister Mary became queen, she married ~~Philip~~ the Catholic Phillip II of Spain and restored Catholicism in England. Protestants who opposed this were executed, earning her the name "Bloody Mary." After Elizabeth became queen, she again broke England away from the Catholic Church. Her new Anglican Church was a compromise between the two sides; it retained the rituals of Catholicism while using Protestant doctrine. Hard-line protestants, called Puritans, sought to remove all traces of Catholicism, but they were not suppressed. There were laws forcing people to submit to ~~the~~ the Anglican Church, but ~~there~~ there were few inquiries of people's true inner beliefs. What mattered most was loyalty to the state.

Catherine de Médicis was the regent for three of her sons when they were each the king of France. At the time, there were 3 noble families vying for control. The Bourbons and the Chatillons were Protestant, while the Guises were Catholic. Catherine sought to protect the throne from noble threats. At first, she sided with the Protestants against the powerful Guises. Later, she changed sides with the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, in which many Huguenots were killed.

Although both were politiques, Elizabeth and Catherine were very different. Elizabeth worked for the good of her nation, ~~and~~ Religion was second to national loyalty. Elizabeth used religious compromises as a unifying force for her people. Catherine, on the other hand, worked only to protect her family's throne. She saw religious conflict as a threat to it, and would ~~switch sides take~~ and switch sides against whichever group was perceived as a greater threat. Her policies would plunge her nation into religious war, while Elizabeth was able to keep the peace in her own.
